Single conjunct and resolved agreement in Homshetsma*

Baran Günay^{1,2}, Ümit Atlamaz¹ & Ömer Demirek¹
Boğaziçi University¹, İstanbul Aydın University²

1. Introduction

Languages vary in how they resolve agreement dependencies between a probe and a conjoined noun phrase (&P) (Benmamoun et al. 2009, Bhatt and Walkow 2013, Murphy and Puskar 2018, Nevins and Weisser 2019). While some languages consistently display Resolved Agreement (RA), whereby both conjuncts contribute to the determination of the ϕ -features on the probe, others resort to a Single Conjunct Agreement (SCA) strategy where only one conjunct controls the ϕ -features of the probe. SCA also comes in various forms. In some languages, the choice of single conjunct is determined by structural prominence, i.e. highest conjunct controls agreement. In others, the conjunct that is linearly closest to the probe controls the agreement: leading to Last Conjunct Agreement (LCA) when the verb follows the &P, and First Conjunct Agreement (FCA) when the verb precedes the &P. Homshetsma reveals a novel pattern in agreement with conjoined noun phrases. Preverbal &Ps display both LCA and FCA in addition to RA. RA is always available as an option. The choice between LCA and FCA is modulated by a Person Hierarchy. In the postverbal position, only RA and FCA is possible and the Person Hierarchy does not play a role. In this paper, we explore this unique pattern and give a syntactic and post-syntactic account.

The organization of the paper is as follows: Section 2 presents some basic background on Homshetsma morphosyntax. Section 3 lays out the agreement facts and provides the core generalizations. Section 4 presents our analysis. Section 5 concludes the discussion.

2. Homshetsma¹

Homshetsma belongs to the Armenian branch of the Indo-European language family, and it is considered a severely endangered language Moseley (2010). It is mainly spoken in
