The Effects of the Big Five Personality Traits on Self-Leadership*

Beş Faktör Kişilik Özelliklerinin Öz Liderlik Üzerine Etkileri

Nevra Baker

Abstract: The purpose of this study is to contribute to the personality and self-leadership literatures by examining the direct effects of each personality dimension within the Big Five Personality Model (extraversion, agreeableness, conscientiousness, openness to experience, and neuroticism) on self-leadership and its three subdimensions: behavior-focused strategies, natural reward strategies, and constructive thought pattern strategies. A survey was administered to 249 participants to test the research hypotheses. The study population consisted of first-year students studying in various departments of the Faculty of Economics and Administrative Sciences at a foundation university in Istanbul during the 2024-25 Spring semester. The 44-item Big Five Personality Inventory, developed by John, Donahue, and Kentle (1991) and adapted into Turkish by Demirel (2023), was used to analyze the personality traits of extraversion (8 items), agreeableness (9 items), conscientiousness (9 items), openness to experience (10 items), and neuroticism (8 items). The 9-item Abbreviated Self-Leadership Questionnaire (RSLQ), developed by Houghton et al. (2012), was used to assess self-leadership. This scale consists of three factors: goal setting (4 items), self-reward (1 item), and mental imagery (4 items). This scale was adapted into Turkish by Şahin (2015). The findings indicated that four of the five-factor personality traits (extraversion, agreeableness, conscientiousness, and openness to experience) had a positive effect on self-leadership and its three sub-dimensions. Neuroticism, on the other hand, had a negative effect only on behavior-focused strategies, a sub-dimension of self-leadership.
