ABSTRACT

Formulae display: MathJax

This study offers a novel approach to analyzing environmental degradation in the context of international trade by applying an Environmental Gravity Model. Covering 166 countries over the period 2000 to 2022, the study examines the carbon footprint embodied in global fiber trade, focusing on the effects of trade value, trade weight, and trade distance on emissions. The findings reveal that synthetic fibers – such as polyester, acrylic, and polyamide – impose significantly higher environmental burdens due to their energy-intensive production processes and heightened sensitivity to trade-related factors. In contrast, natural fibers, including bamboo and hemp, exhibit lower embodied carbon footprints, although cotton, wool, and silk display notable emissions linked to production and long-distance transportation. The study highlights the need for targeted policy interventions to promote low-carbon technologies, optimize trade logistics, and encourage the use of sustainable natural fibers.

Abstract

This study examines the impact of employee happiness on firm performance in the UK using data from the "Best 100 British Companies to Work For" list (2001–2020). Applying the Carhart four-factor model to monthly data, we find that happier firms outperform the market, generating a monthly alpha of 32 basis points (3.86% annualized), which increases further to 34 basis points when weighted by ranking. Newly listed firms experience significant abnormal returns, whereas delisted firms show no excess returns, suggesting asymmetric market reactions to inclusion versus removal. Disaggregated analysis by industry shows the highest alpha in the technology sector, where human capital and innovation amplify the role of employee satisfaction. The industrial sector yields more modest alphas, likely reflecting capital intensity, more rigid work environments, and sectoral heterogeneity. A longevity analysis indicates that the market fully incorporates the intangible benefits of listing only after 36 months. Robustness checks using Fama-MacBeth regressions confirm that employee-related factors—such as workplace conditions, rewards, happiness, and demographics—significantly influence firm performance.
