Abstract

Purpose This study aimed to examine the effectiveness of a brief online yoga- and mindfulness-based psychoeducation program and its possible working mechanisms (rumination and self-compassion) in improving psychological health parameters (depression, anxiety, and stress) among women who have experienced domestic violence (DV).

Method In a randomized controlled trial, 51 women who had survived DV were assigned to either an intervention group ($n = 27$) or a waitlist control group ($n = 24$). The intervention was a five-week yoga- and mindfulness-based psychoeducation program conducted online. Before and after the intervention, the presence of symptoms related to depression, anxiety, and stress, as well as the level of rumination and self-compassion were assessed.

Results At the post-test, participants in the intervention group reported higher mean scores in self-compassion and lower mean scores in rumination, depression, anxiety, and stress compared to those in the waitlist control group. Mediation analyses revealed that rumination and self-compassion mediated the intervention's effects on psychological health parameters.

Discussion Our findings support the effectiveness of a brief online yoga- and mindfulness-based psychoeducation program for improving the psychological health of women who have experienced DV. Self-compassion and rumination emerged as working mechanisms underlying the intervention's success. Future research should explore brief yet effective online psychoeducation programs, considering self-compassion and rumination as potential working mechanisms when designing interventions for women who have experienced domestic violence.

Clinical Trial Registration This study has been retrospectively registered in ClinicalTrials.gov (NCT06061029).

Keywords Brief yoga and mindfulness · Online psychoeducation · Self-compassion · Rumination · Domestic violence · Psychological health
