Abstract. Coursebooks remain a dominant source of lexical input in ELT, yet CEFR labels are often treated as proxies for lexical suitability without empirical verification. This study applies corpus-based analysis to compare the lexical characteristics of A2-level reading texts in three widely used ELT coursebook series (Language Hub, Empower, and The Big Picture). Reading passages exceeding 50 words were compiled into three sub-corpora and analyzed across lexical diversity (TTR and MLTD), lexical density, and frequency/coverage patterns (NGSL vs. off list). Results show that surface diversity (TTR) is broadly similar across books ($\approx 53\%$ – 55%), but length-sensitive diversity (MLTD) and text-level peaks reveal non-equivalent lexical variety across materials. Lexical density averages cluster within a moderate band ($M = 50.71$ – 52.76), yet within-book distributions include substantial shifts, with multiple texts exceeding 60% density and sizable sets below 50% in two series. Frequency profiling indicates high overall NGSL alignment

Triumphal Arches (Tak) Architecture as a Temporary Architectural Device: A Study on Early Republican Period in Turkey Examples

İlke Ciritci¹

¹ Assoc. Prof., Istanbul Aydın University, Faculty of Architecture and Design, The Architecture (English) Program, Istanbul, Türkiye.

Abstract

This article examines triumphal arches (TAK) erected on urban squares and main axes during the early Republican period in Turkey as ephemeral architectural elements, positioned between monument, gateway and decorative portal typologies. The conceptual framework is structured around ephemerality, monumentality, collective memory and nation-building, and interpreting these reads arches as both spatial interfaces and ideological communication devices. Methodologically, the study combines a literature review, archival documents, photographs and plan analyses; ceremonial arches in Istanbul, Ankara, Izmir, Adana, Zonguldak, Diyarbakir, Samsun and other cities are classified through a comparative analysis reading. Common formal features are evaluated under the headings of number of openings, vertical mass configuration, material and structure, colour and graphic language, and urban location. The findings indicate that Republican arches appropriate the archetypal scheme of ancient triumphal arches, yet translate discourses of modernization and national unity into space through the use of red-white colour codes, portraits of Atatürk, institutional emblems and numerical slogans. The article argues that these temporary yet highly representative installations should be documented and discussed as part of modern architectural heritage and reconsidered as an installation language that can inform contemporary urban design and commemorative practices.

Keywords: Collective Memory, Monumentality, Temporary Architecture, Triumphal Arch Architecture.
